BALTIC REGION SECURITY UPDATE

Update from our analyst at Ambrey

Recent UAV activity in the Baltics reflects a shift in Ukrainian targeting priorities, with attacks increasingly focused on softer inland hydrocarbon infrastructure supporting Russian Baltic ports rather than heavily defended port facilities themselves. Strikes on Primorsk and the Kirishi refinery, alongside recurring air raid alerts across the Leningrad region, continue to disrupt port operations and highlight the operational vulnerability of Russia's dispersed export infrastructure.

While direct damage to major Baltic ports may remain limited due to stronger air defences, pumping stations, refineries, storage sites, and logistics nodes are likely to remain priority targets. Even unsuccessful or intercepted UAV attacks are continuing to impose operational and commercial costs through temporary port shutdowns, delays, and wider business disruption, keeping the near-term threat environment across the Baltic elevated and dynamic.

Separately, Norway experienced two significant counter-intelligence incidents linked to suspected Chinese intelligence activity. Norwegian authorities seized a Chinese-origin satellite data receiver reportedly intended for Andøya Spaceport and arrested individuals suspected of involvement in intelligence collection targeting sensitive military and space-related infrastructure in Bodø and the High North.

The incidents reinforce concerns around foreign intelligence collection efforts targeting Arctic, satellite, defence, and NATO-linked infrastructure, using a mix of commercial cover, technical collection systems, and physical proximity to strategic sites. While no convictions have been made, the cases highlight the continued exposure of Norway's High North to covert intelligence activity and the importance of early detection and scrutiny of seemingly civilian-linked operations near sensitive facilities.
